

What part of my work am I still trying to fully control — and why do I need that guarantee? What fear would appear if I allowed that part to remain undecided?

If my artwork were a system rather than an object, what rules would actually govern it — and which ones am I pretending are neutral? What happens if I make those rules visible instead of hiding them inside form?

Where in my process could an error stop being a failure and start becoming information?

What do I want to be the author of: the image, or the conditions under which the image emerges? If I step back, what would continue acting in my place?

How much uncertainty am I willing to allow — not aesthetically, but existentially — in my practice right now?

Studio Reflections

